Ethics

OUR NAME is Bloomberg. It is a good name and must never be tarnished by anything that we say or do. We adhere to the following ethical standards in our newsgathering and reporting:

We seek to avoid a conflict of interest, which is an economic, personal or political relationship that may compromise a journalist's impartiality. We are mindful that the appearance of a conflict or impropriety can be as damaging to a reputation as doing something improper.

Bloomberg News does not allow external parties or the commercial interests of Bloomberg LP to dictate our reporting. Altering a story because it may embarrass a company or individual would create the perception that we yield to outside pressure, and that would cost us our integrity.

When exposing the wrongdoing of others, we should be above reproach. The greater the story's impact, the greater our obligation to withstand the most exacting scrutiny.

Bloomberg journalists don't break the law to gather news and, no matter what the law permits, aren't deceptive, duplicitous or dishonest. Although it isn't necessarily illegal to pay sources, Bloomberg never pays for information other than data or original reporting that is protected by copyright laws. We don't use another person or group to violate laws on our behalf.
